Explaining the modus operandi, investigators said there was a hierarchy in how the scamsters operated. Some of them were tasked with calling up unsuspecting citizens, largely women, over Skype or WhatsApp posing as policemen. They would scare the victim by claiming that a parcel that he/she had sent by courier was found to be containing drugs. They also flashed fake police IDs to deceive the victim. "The victims were sent into downloading apps that provided the scamster with remote access to their phone screen," said DCP Ajay Bansal. The victims were then coerced into entering their bank account details on the phone. Once the victim keyed in the details, the fraudster viewed them through the app and emptied their account.
